

Is it time you appointed a new cleaning company?

When I receive a call from a prospective client, one of the things often disclosed is their dissatisfaction with their current cleaning company. The reasons vary greatly, but if the need for change has already been recognised, the next step is to terminate your current arrangements and appoint someone else.

Surprisingly, some find terminating such existing arrangements difficult due to a 'built up over time' relationship. However, if you are not getting the quality of clean you are paying for, and if you're having to go around and clean yourself after the cleaner has left for the day, night or weekend, or your cleaner is generally unreliable - why should you put up with it?

Is your current cleaner able to demonstrate:

- That they have the ability and knowledge to perform the task effectively, efficiently and with the utmost care of your office;
- That they see things which need to be cleaned and clean them on their own initiative - without prompting by you;
- That they have full insurance cover for public liability and property damage risk;
- That they use only high quality cleaning products and cloths in the process;
- That they are reliable and trustworthy

A competent cleaning person can add real value to your office. A clean office is a happy office.
